

PUBLISHED DECEMBER 18, 2014

Victoria's Secret models aren't 'hot'; provide unattainable concept of beauty Like 0

Victoria's Secret models are certainly getting slammed for their looks, left and right, this week. Journalist Seth Stevenson made comments about the models' appearance at the 2014 Victoria's Secret Fashion Show, according to a Wednesday, Dec. 17 report on Bustle. Now an expert physician is coming out and saying that looking like a Victoria's Secret model is an unattainable concept of beauty that's been ingrained in society.

Men usually drool over the tall and sexy Victoria's Secret Angels. Until now. Seth Stevenson wrote an editorial for the Fashionista about his recent experience in London at the Victoria's Secret Fashion Show. He said that the models aren't as "hot" in person as they look in the sexy television ads or in the super hot catalog.

The journalist went on to write, "In person, a lot of the VS models were more freakish than sexy... Their limbs were like toothpicks, seemingly in danger of snapping at any given moment. They moved like gangly baby horses that were too leggy for their own bodies."

Ouch. That was not all he wrote either. Stevenson didn't stop there. He added, "And while some of these ladies indeed had lovely faces, many among them had mugs of such extreme angles and proportions that they ceased to be attractive — cheekbones cantilevering so far afield that they almost seemed like face-wings. I shudder picturing it now."

As if anyone needed a straight male's opinion on what he thinks about this year's crop of Victoria's Secret models. Most men don't have a unanimous opinion on what they think is sexy. Some like breasts, while others like legs. If anything, he should've kept his opinions to himself.

That still won't stop women from going to extremes to look like these Victoria's Secret models. Now Dr. Karlinsky of New Look New Life Surgical Arts has recently talked about the clients that rush into her office to look like a Victoria's Secret Angel. Dr. Karlinsky is a highly-skilled and board-certified facial and body sculpting specialist, according to Beauty World News.

Dr. Karlinsky says she believes it's ridiculous to think that one can undergo plastic surgery to look like a Victoria's Secret Angel. She believes that someone should never undergo cosmetic surgery in order to look like somebody else. Karlinsky says that women should figure out what bothers them and try to address it, or they will never seek true happiness.

The specialist said that she doesn't think the Victoria's Secret models are "freaks of nature." Dr. Karlinsky believes that these women have the bodies, which is considered the unattainable concept of beauty. Their bodies aren't going to be achieved through exercise, diet or non-surgical intervention.

Even this standard of beauty is not enough to suffice some men like Stevenson. Society still has a ways to go when it comes to accepting people's unique features. Men like Stevenson won't help the cause, while women will still go to desperate extremes to look like a Victoria's Secret model.